In the summer of 2008, James Cameron was buoyed by the success of Climate Change Capital (CCC), the firm he had cofounded to marshal private capital to help fight climate change. Besides advisory services, the firm had entered the funds business with a bang, building a portfolio of investments in carbon abatement, drawing assets from a number of deep-pocketed investors, and gaining headlines in the business press across the world. He came to believe that there needed to be a new type of investment firm to guide finance professionals in the new world of carbon allocations; a firm that would array the power of markets to take on the global challenge of controlling GHGs. But a growing divide within his organization would challenge Cameron’s thinking—were these just the growing pains for a burgeoning enterprise or evidence of more serious problems?
